Earth Day

Earth Day occurs one day a year on April 22nd, it is the celebration of our earth and raises awareness and supports our environment. Due to tree clearing (not necessarily in Vermont) animals are forced to leave their homes and will no longer have protection from predators, and the population of the species will decline.

With the strong winds in Vermont, it spreads garbage like, cans, bottles, etcetera, all over the road, yards, sidewalks, and other places. A few things I love about Vermont are all the wildlife you can see, the wonderful view, the cold winters, and nomader where you go you will always see at least one tree.

If we continue to leave around our garbage, whether it's throwing it out of car windows, or leaving it at the beach for wildlife to eat, or to get picked up by the tide. Soon, all of it will be gone and the garbage will spread globally, and it will be in ponds, lakes, seas, oceans.

Then all that garbage will gather to the surface for fish and other animals to eat and get sick, over time it will spread, then humans will eat that animal and humans will get sick. By the time that happens, there won't be enough Earth Days to help.

That's why we have to keep our Earth clean, and Earth Day is just one of the ways we can help. That's why people in Vermont do Green Up Day. On the first Saturday of May, most everyone takes a green garbage bag, and cleans up our environment. Some people spend hours cleaning up, others spend five minutes.

No matter how much anyone cleans every little bit helps. All of them, poaching, littering, etcetera. It's all going to backfire on humans. There are roughly 26,000 different species in Vermont alone. If humans continue to pollute, 26,000, can drop to one really quick. All of these little things about Vermont, all the small details that no one pays attention to, all the animals that lots of people hunt. It can all disappear. With all the ways we can help, we can certainly have more than one day to clean up.
